One day after baseball practice, the coach asked Brad to stay behind, so that he could help him with his glove. It wasn't a very nice glove, but Brad loved it because his grandma bought it for him at a yard sale. Brad loved baseball and was so excited that Grandma signed the form to let him play on a real team. Practice was just down the street from their trailer, so he could walk there after school. He loved being with the team and the coach was the nicest person he'd ever met as well as his school counselor. Coach started working on the threading of Brad's glove. "When you took your hoodie off during practice, I saw that you have bruises on your back," he said. "What happened?" "Oh it's nothing, I fell off my bike," Brad replied. "I want you to know you are safe here, if you ever need to tell me anything. You can talk to me at practice or at school. Your teachers will let you come to my office anytime you need to talk." "Yes sir, I know. I'm good. I promise."

After he walked home, Brad knew that he had to tell someone about his step dad. He was so mean. The bruises were getting harder to hide. He thought if he just stayed quiet and went to bed early he could avoid all the fighting, but lately it was just getting worse.

That night Brad was scared and waited for the yelling to stop but it didn't. He climbed out the window and ran to the baseball field, eventually falling asleep under the bleachers, until the sound of birds woke him up the next morning. He ran around the corner just in time to see the bus turning on his street. Grateful, he climbed on the bus to escape the nightmare at home.

When they arrived at school he went to the cafeteria to get breakfast, which was the first thing he'd eaten since lunch yesterday; and then walked slowly to the School Counseling Office.

Coach was there getting a cup of coffee. "Come on in, Brad. How's it going?"

Brad just stared at him, working up the courage to tell the truth. "Let's go to my office so we can talk."
